The meeting was on the whole most successful, only marred to a slight extent by the unkindness of the weather on some of the days. In spite of this the members of the Association, who turned up in great force for the occasion, seemed to enjoy themselves thoroughly, and much appreciated the hospitality extended to them by the University and the city, as well as the opportunity of seeing the beauties of Oxford. Probably many of those who attended the meeting had previously been unaware of the completeness of the means available at Oxford for the teaching of the scientific side at least of medicine. The excellence of the laboratories provided for the study of Anatomy, Physiology, Chemistry and Pathology, not to mention other less distinctly medical sciences, will have opened the eyes of many to the progress made by...
