In it an effort has been made to place the analyst or student en rapport with all the best methods of studying the composition of agricultural products. During the progress of the work the author has frequently been asked why some special method in each case has not been designated as the proper one to be used. To do this would be a radical departure from the fundamental idea of the work; viz., to rely on the good judgment and experience of the chemist. It is not likely that the author's judgment in such matters is better than that of the analyst using the book, and, except for beginning students pursuing a course of laboratory instruction, a biased judgment is little better than none at all. For student's work in the laboratory or classroom it is probable that a volume of selected methods based on the present work may be prepared later on, but this possible future need has not been allowed to change the purpose of the author as expressed in the preface of the second volume to present to the busy worker a broad view of a great subject. For the courtesy and patience of the publishers, for the uniformly commendatory notices of the reviewers of volumes one and two, and for...
