The artist, wishing to make the accessories of the portrait subservient to the sentiment of the man, placed Heysham by a table, upon which stood a falcon of his own shooting, and in his hand a flower, as illustrative of the doctors botanical and zoological studies. The lithographed portrait on the frontispiece of this volume is taken from a miniature of Dr. Heysham in his sixty-sixth year, and acknowledged to be a perfect likeness. A bust was also made of him in his seventy-second year, by the famed sculptor, Musgrave Lewthwaite Watson. Both works show a lofty, broad, and finelyproportioned head, with comparatively small occipital region. The ear is well lobed, the nose aquiline and notable. The mouth and chin show no alteration from their pristine regularity and character even at the age of seventy-two years. Dr. Heysham professed a strong physique, and was capable of great and long-continued exertions. He was an early riser, and almost invariably the first person to survey from the west walls of the city the picturesque views of the Vale of Cauda, and to 96 PALEY AND HEYSHAM AS TRENCHER-MEN. judge of the weather indications from the grey dawn. He was often abroad for three hours before breakfast, botanising, or, it may be said, naturalising, as nothing in animated nature escaped his attention. He was one of the hard-headed philosophic sort of men, and strongly-stomached, like his friend Dr. Paley, the eminent divine; but the doctor of...
